

LOW PARKS MUSEUM

a unique and historical setting for weddings, corporate and social events

Hamilton lies in the Central Lowlands of Scotland where the Clyde and Avon rivers meet at the head of the Clyde Valley's rich, agricultural lands. This bustling historic town was once the estate of the Dukes of Hamilton. The Duke's Hunting Lodge at Chatelherault, Hamilton Mausoleum, the Low Parks Museum buildings and the Parish Church designed by William Adam are all reminders of the links between the town and the Hamilton family.

The Low Parks Museum provides an insight to the local history and is the oldest surviving building in Hamilton. Recently refurbished, it displays the history of the Hamilton family and provides an insight into the lifestyles and domestic occupations that shaped the local area. It's also home to the Cameronian's regimental museum.

During the 17th century Hamilton was the main stopping place for the Scotland to England stagecoach. The coaching inn is now part of the Low Parks Museum on Muir Street. (The old route south through Muir Wynd had long been recognised as difficult for coaches. To avoid this route, a new highway was constructed in 1819 by Thomas Telford that included a bridge over the Cadzow Burn - and the commercial heart of the town shifted to Cadzow Street).

It has been a local museum since the 1960's and now as one complex of historic buildings is a major cultural attraction and venue in south Lanarkshire which was awarded 5 stars – the highest visitor attraction accolade available under the Visit Scotland Grading Scheme.
